Dear Sir,

I am an Indian student, and have studied the Oriental languages at Cambridge from where I got my Ph.D. in June last. During my stay in Europe I got the opportunity and had the honour of reading many of the important and all-embracing scholarly works of your late-lamented father.

Now I want to translate some of those works, into Urdu (Indian). As a matter of fact I have already some Chapters of the Muhammedanische Studien, but before I go on any further with the work I must have your kind permission to publish the translation when it is complete. I hope therefore that you would be kind enough not to grudge me this favour.

At the end I may be allowed to say that as the work is purely literary, and there is ^{being} little or no prospect of any financial gain by it, therefore I would not be to make any financial advance if the permission is subjected to any such thing. I would like to have the reply by the address which I give below, because I would leave Berlin on Monday next.

Address:-

Kings College
Cambridge

Yours v. truly
